An optical disc storage medium, which is widely known as a typical magneto-optic disc storage medium, is provided with a groove preformed on its information recording surface and an optical head for focusing light on this groove is provided with a light source which emits a light beam of a relatively small diameter such as a semiconductor laser, and an objective lens disposed in a position facing the information recording surface. In the conventional case, it is difficult to change the location of the groove formed in the information recording surface, while using a fixed optical head, and a device is necessitated to detect the groove location and to automatically perform a tracking operation for moving a light spot to the desired location of the groove, to thereby achieve stable reading and writing. The device for detecting the groove location and the tracking servo mechanism are desired to be compact. FIG. 1 is a schematic illustration showing one example of the principle of reading and writing in the conventional magneto-optic disc storage medium. As shown in FIG. 1, the magneto-optic disc storage medium is provided with a groove, which is formed on the information recording surface thereof, and the groove is optically detected. A light beam from a light source 101 is focused by an objective lens 102 through a polarization beam splitter 103 to impinge on an information recording surface. The reflected light beam is focused on a two-division photodetector 110 through the objective lens 102 and the polarization beam splitter 103, and a read signal is obtained by the photodetector 110 from a difference between a light receiving signal of a photo detector 110a and a light receiving signal of a photo detector 110b. In addition, by using a tracking error signal, a tracking servo is performed for moving the objective lens 102 to the track of the groove.
