We've seen the evolution of the sustainable fashion movement, and we've seen designers like Stella McCartney launch collections that not only incorporate sustainable fibers and materials into their collections, but also tell a story of how important it is to stop mindless waste—like the number of plastic water bottles we keep pouring down the drain. Since 2011, the designer has been partnering with plastic-bottle collection company KeepItBecause.com, which created exclusive collections. By 2014, McCartney's sustainable collection featured not just purchases of KeepItBecause's bottles, but also other items like cork wine corks and custom-made wooden wine racks made from discarded wine bottles. The collection was featured in a campaign called #bagthebottle. Even when we aren't shopping for McCartney's line, the enthusiasm for the collection speaks to the momentum of the sustainable fashion movement. Here are some of our favorite sustainable items to learn from McCartney's collection. Wine Corks Photo courtesy of Stella McCartney Stella McCartney Ever since she was a teenager, McCartney has been pro-wine. After joining her family's vineyard in Italy, she gained experience working with sommeliers and vineyard owners to learn about the wine-making process, and she has been producing wine in England ever since. (see: Tastings with Stella, 2012.) Her collection features wine corks made from discarded wine bottles, an environmentalist and passion project of the designer's. Rug Photo

Thus, the Valsalva maneuver caused by the transient alveolar hypotension during the operation can produce relative hypotension and subsequent increased effectiveness of aortic clamping during the operation, which is likely to suppress any damage to the myofibrils. In the present study, the respiratory rate reduced in all three groups during the operation, which was considered to reflect the effort of breathing during the operation and was thought to have been influenced by the respiratory rate. The decrease in the tidal volume was greater in the BVM group than in the NS group, indicating that the BVM was especially useful for maintaining a sufficient tidal volume during thoracotomy operations. In addition, the BVM group showed superior respiratory quality even though the ratio of the respiratory rate to the tidal volume was almost the same between the two groups at the time of the operation (Table 3){#Tab3}{ref-type="table"}). These results indicate that the BVM should have a greater effect on the survival of myofibrils during operations involving prolonged thoracotomy, thereby making the operation more successful. However, the BVM did not have an effect on the serum ATP level during thoracotomy, which is considered to be the hallmark of the survival of myofibrils, and the cardiotoxicity associated with thoracotomy operations was not decreased by the BVM (Fig. 3){#Fig3}{ref-type="fig"}c). This result suggests that the BVM had no influence on the severe damage to myofibrils during thoracotomy operations. However, it is unknown how much my
