It's in the expressions that make up the many ways that we communicate with one another. To understand how I feel about my current line of employment can be easily done if you have taken a look at my blogroll on the right. The top four sites on the list are from my industry, the bottom four are from my hobbies. I think it's obvious. Well, I think it's obvious. The feature is being made available today, and it is currently only supported by Chromebase, a single-port, all-in-one Chrome OS-powered PC. The feature comes from Google's new payments API which allows web apps to make in-browser purchases. Before today, owners of Google's Chrome OS-powered devices would have to go into their device's settings to authorize third-party apps to make in-browser purchases. Now that functionality is built into the operating system. Chromebase gets access to a web app's checkout page To make an in-browser purchase using the new Google payments API, you'll have to have a web app you're interested in making a purchase on serve content with the checkout link. You'll then need to visit the web app's own site with your Chrome browser, navigate to the site's checkout page, and tap the blue "Pay with Google" button. The feature is being rolled out to users today, and it will allow users to purchase a subscription to a web app such as The Wall Street Journal, The Verge, or Taylor Swift's Spotify subscription. What's New In Photoshop CC 2015 Version 18?

A new report from the Department of Homeland Security entitled, "Broader Social Media Campaigns: Staying Ahead of a Darkening Information Environment," warns that U.S. citizens and foreign nationals could be at greater risk of cyber-attacks on account of social media platforms. The Department of Homeland Security report warns that cyberattacks could be used to "leverage the dissemination of propaganda, recruit terrorists, and disrupt or subvert our democratic process." The DHS report includes analysis about a broad range of actors—including state actors, terrorists, and organized criminal groups—that could use social media platforms to gain access to sensitive information. The U.S. government, however, does not have a specific policy in place to combat the threat of social media platforms. "The report makes it clear that we continue to face a complex, evolving threat," Homeland Security Secretary Kirstjen Nielson said. "The good news is that we are engaged and continue to stay ahead of this evolving threat, and we are committed to using the tools at our disposal, including social media platforms, to support our efforts in order to protect our citizens." The Department of Homeland Security's Cyber Issues Coordination Unit released the report, titled, "Broader Social Media Campaigns: Staying Ahead of a Darkening Information Environment," on Oct. 7. "The world of cyberspace is in a state of flux," said Steve King, acting Under Secretary for Intelligence and Analysis at the Department of Homeland Security. "Our understanding of how the information revolution is impacting activities that once were offline is only just beginning." As new technologies proliferate, the social media ecosystem is changing at a staggering pace. The report found that social media platforms are used to express a wide variety of political and religious opinions, including Islamic extremism, radical political factions, and advocacy for terrorist organizations. Citing the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria, or ISIS, as an example, the report states that the group's social media capabilities are "all part of a wider macro-trend of spreading propaganda and recruiting followers as well as the recruitment of suicide bombers." Furthermore, the report notes that social media platforms are being used to spread propaganda about political candidates and foreign elections and to spread political information about domestic U.S. elections. The DHS report notes that the cyber threat to social media platforms is as old as the internet itself. The report authors point to a 2008 Los Angeles Times article that cites a Google document outlining
