Q: Linking.a library files to a shared library I am using Xcode 4.6.3 and I am making a shared library based on the example shared library in the documentation (click here). Everything worked fine. Here is what I did: I selected the file and I created a library called LibUserData. I selected the project and set the library folder for the newly created library. I imported the code (included.m) in my main code. The problem is that I created my library as a static library. Because of that, the code itself is not in the.o file. My question is: Is it possible to include my.a files (the.o files) inside the.so library? Currently, I have to copy my.m files manually in my shared library file to make it work. Thank you in advance. EDIT: Also, the.a files are not in the same folder as the.o files. (I read something about that before creating the library) A: Static library If the library is static, there's no need for the whole code to be in the library. You just need to create the library and build it, and then when building a project that uses that library, you link it. Dynamic library Static library is a bit dangerous because the linker doesn't know what code from the library will end up in the final binary. So even if you link the static library, you can't assume that all of its object files contain all of the library's code
