Two weeks after the first results came out in the LIBOR rate-fixing scandal, some names from the investigation have been released to the public. Some of those names include former Barclays traders Alistair Thompson, Michael Green, Simon Johnson, and Jonathan Lee and ex-Barclays analyst Ed Skilling. There are quite a few Barclays employees who have been named so far, and many of them are being denied access to the court overseeing the investigation, just as MPC Chairman Ben Broadbent was last week. On September 27, some of the names were mentioned in a U.S. Senate committee to investigate the affair. Former employee of Barclays Bill Broady, who worked in the Special Investment Products division, gave a statement to lawmakers. He described how he was informed by his boss on June 27th, 2007 that one of the team's traders had requested an adjustment in the index for a "special project." To the best of his knowledge, Broady didn't know which trader it was, but he did know that it wasn't the index for which he's supposed to be working. Broady told the Senate panel that he thought that the trader was acting irresponsibly and possibly illegally. Yet, the trader submitted a request to Barclays for the adjustment to the London Inter-bank Offered Rate (LIBOR). The plan was to use Enron style back-dating to make it appear that it wasn't the rigged index that was being fixed, and so regulators and legislators would be a little bit more receptive to Barclays' position. Broady told the committee he became frightened of speaking up, and that it took some time for him to convince himself to say anything. Broady says that on the following day, someone told him that the trader had confessed and that the Bank had handled it responsibly. U.S. Senator Carl Levin told the Daily Telegraph, "Broady told me that his trader had committed fraud and had admitted it, but the whole thing had been handled responsibly." Broady told
