The authors prospectively compared the performance of 18F-choline PET/CT with CT and magnetic resonance (MR) imaging in detecting recurrent ovarian cancer in 10 patients with an elevated CA125. PET/CT and CT performed at 16-59 and 16-31 min after 18F-choline injection and at 43-49 min after injection of CT contrast medium, respectively, were interpreted in consensus by a board-certified nuclear medicine and radiology reader as positive, negative, or indeterminate.

Findings were correlated with surgical and histopathologic results. Fourteen malignant lesions were identified on PET/CT, 12 (86%) of which were confirmed by surgery or biopsy. PET/CT showed seven lesions that were not evident on CT or MR.

Three lesions, which were indeterminate on CT and not visible on MR, were interpreted as positive for tumor on PET/CT. Findings in the mediastinum and bone were also considered suspicious for tumor, but tissue confirmation was unavailable. No lesions were considered benign on PET/CT. In the five patients with benign pelvic masses, PET/CT interpretations were benign in three, suspicious for malignancy in one, and indeterminate in one. Although PET/CT overestimated the number of positive findings, all findings were malignant except for the indeterminate lesions. In the two patients with known benign pelvic masses, PET/CT correctly classified the lesions as benign or malignant. PET/CT had higher sensitivity and specificity than CT or MR in detecting ovarian cancer in patients with a CA125 elevation. The addition of PET/CT to CT/MR resulted in fewer benign findings and more malignant findings. The authors concluded that PET/CT is the imaging modality of choice for the detection of recurrent ovarian cancer when the CA125 is elevated.
