Many server makers (including Dell, Sun Microsystems and, of course, HP) have committed to providing their customers with Open Compute hardware by July 2010. While a fine commitment, it doesn't include any specific information on how the integration will go. The other committers have made their "Open Compute Platform, Volume 2" proposal available on the OCP wiki, which covers basic characteristics of the new virtualization environment. But it lacks any reference to the Open Compute support for IPv6. Two practical problems that we encountered with the first Open Compute offering (OCP1). 1) Customers had to prepare for the separation of the networking and virtualization pieces by investing in servers and networking hardware that support Open Compute, rather than
